Cretum Growth, Value & Volatility Fund

The flexibility of investing globally

Fund Overview

Cretum Capital is an asset management firm specializing in a Macro-Multi-Strategy approach with a focus on North America. Our primary objective is to achieve superior risk-adjusted returns by integrating Macroeconomic analysis, fundamental company analysis, and assessing political and economic factors. Cretum Capital is committed to long-term outperformance while maintaining a focus on capital preservation under all circumstances. Our strategy involves deploying diverse market positions, including long/short positions in equities, indices, currencies, interest rate spreads, and dividend strategies. We aim to diversify risk through covariance analysis, seeking low correlations between asset classes, especially during periods of stress and heightened volatility.

Market Commentary

July 2026 was a month of rotations rather than of trends. Capital moved decisively away from the names that had led the market for most of the year and toward the segments that had been left behind.

In the U.S., the month delivered flat and negative results, but the headline masked what was happening underneath. The S&P 500 ended July with just +0.03%, and the dispersion between segments was strong. The SOX Index dropped 20.6% during the month and the Nasdaq 100 declined 6.6%. In practice, this was the first month of 2026 in which the AI-and-semiconductor complex (which had carried the market since spring), took a clear pause, while cyclicals, financials, and value names quietly outperformed.

The turning point of the month was, once again, the Federal Reserve. At the July 28–29 FOMC meeting, the Fed voted 9–3 to hold the federal funds rate at 3.50%–3.75%, marking the fifth consecutive meeting without a change. The post-meeting statement was almost identical to June's and, keeping with Kevin Warsh's stated preference against forward guidance, was notably shorter than what had been the norm. The message underneath, however, was hawkish. Therefore, equity reaction was immediate. In the minutes after the decision, the S&P 500 and Nasdaq slid roughly 0.6%, and the 30-year Treasury yield jumped more than nine basis points. A late-month rebound on the final trading session, powered by strong Big Tech results, prevented the index from closing meaningfully lower for the month.

Beyond monetary policy, the month was shaped by the Q2 earnings season, which turned out to be a bifurcated affair. Microsoft surged after signaling that its AI investments were beginning to pay off, while Meta was punished as its free cash flow contracted on the back of aggressive spending plans, and Amazon rallied on the final session on strong cloud-growth commentary. Rather than a broad de-rating, July looked like a genuine rotation: investors trimmed the most crowded AI trades, rewarded companies delivering tangible earnings, and rebuilt exposure to cyclicals, financials, and community banks that stand to benefit from a Fed that stays higher for longer.

Europe followed a very different script. The European STOXX 600 finished July with a monthly gain and hit an all-time record intraday high before closing at 649.19 points, weathering both the Middle East hostilities and the AI-related jitters that dominated Wall Street. Two forces explained the resilience: a robust earnings season across European large-caps and a very narrow but powerful rally in AI-adjacent names. On the policy side, the ECB kept rates unchanged at its July 24 meeting, but markets read President Christine Lagarde's comments as suggesting a potential further hike as soon as September, a reading reinforced at the end of the month by a July uptick in eurozone inflation that bolstered the odds of an additional 25 basis point hike later in 2026. In short, Europe delivered exactly what the U.S. did not in July: a broad market that closed at records, supported by fundamentals rather than by a single narrative.

In Mexico, the month was quieter than the two prior ones and, on balance, mildly constructive. The S&P/BMV IPC spent most of July inside a narrow band around 66,000–67,300 points and closed the month at 67,327 on July 31 after a 1.28% rally on the final session, essentially flat versus June's close. Beneath the surface, the market's key anchor remained Banxico. The central bank has held its overnight rate at 6.50% since late June, reluctant to ease further while core inflation remains sticky and public finances stay under scrutiny, a stance that has channeled most of the IPC's daily volatility into the global risk channel.

In Asia, China lost part of the momentum it had built in June. After starting the month on a firm footing, mainland equities gave background as global AI-related names sold off. By July 31, the SSE Composite closed at 3,832.26 points after a 0.72% gain on that final session, with the Shenzhen Component finishing at 13,578 and the ChiNext Index closing at 3,343 after a 3.06% jump, in a session that mirrored the same tech-driven rebound seen in New York and Tokyo. Policy remained supportive: the PBOC continued to signal an accommodative stance, and June inflation data was read as consistent with sustained policy accommodation. The main forward catalyst for the market shifted to the Politburo meeting at the end of July, where policymakers were widely expected to set the economic policy agenda for the remainder of 2026, with growing expectations of a meaningful fiscal push after softer summer data.

Foreign-exchange markets reflected the combination of a hawkish Fed but stronger earnings elsewhere with unusual clarity. The U.S. Dollar Index closed July at roughly 99.9, down about 1.6% over the month, marking its weakest weekly showing in three months. The euro's resilience was consistent with the ECB's tightening bias and with European equities' strength. Against the Mexican peso, the picture was more constructive: USD/MXN traded between a high of 17.65 and a low of 17.32 during July, averaged 17.47, and closed the month roughly 0.8% lower than at the start, with the pair supported by Mexico's trade surplus, and a still-attractive rate differential of roughly 275 basis points versus the U.S.

Taken as a whole, July 2026 was a month in which markets began to look under the hood of the 2026 rally for the first time. The pause in semiconductors and mega-cap technology, coming precisely as the Federal Reserve signaled that rates may need to stay higher for longer, was healthy rather than alarming. The macro backdrop into August is one of a still-resilient U.S. economy, sticky inflation, a divided Fed, an ECB with a bias to tighten again, and a dollar that has stopped being a one-way trade. In that environment and consistent with the cautious posture we have maintained since May, discipline in allocation, an emphasis on earnings quality, and preservation of capital continue to look more relevant than chasing whichever theme happens to be leading on any given week.

Performance overview

As we have mentioned in previous letters, we have been invested in SpaceX since it was a private company. This gives us a highly attractive entry price and a substantial embedded gain. Once the company went public and the stock rallied sharply in its first trading sessions, we needed a strategy to protect that gain in the event of a pullback. In consequence, we executed an options strategy near the stock's all-time high, and the strategy added a meaningful return during July, as SpaceX experienced a drawdown of nearly -40%.

We also implemented additional options strategies to hedge most of our semiconductor and memory positions. We were able to anticipate, to some extent, the market's rotation into other sectors; so rather than selling our positions (given our long-term investment thesis), we chose to hedge the downside through options. As a result, our options strategies overall contributed +1.97% to the fund's monthly performance.

Regarding the anticipation we mentioned above, we also decided to migrate from some growth thesis to more of a Value thesis. As you know, the fund relays in three pillars: Growht, Value and Volatility, therefore, we always aim to allocate the fund's assets within these pillars, depending on the market conditions and our outlook. Given the current market levels in many sectors, we decided to increase our Value investments, just to mention some of them, we invested in Berkshire Hathaway, Alibaba, and Harley Davidson, all these stories have in our view a long term upside potential, and during July, they perfomed well and demonstrated to be an assertive asset allocation. We will continue to allocate the fund's in the best opportunities, trying to take advantage of market conditions.

Regarding the anticipation described above, we also decided to rotate a portion of the portfolio from Growth theses toward Value theses. As you know, the fund is built on three pillars: Growth, Value, and Volatility; and we continuously calibrate our allocation across them based on market conditions and our outlook. Given current valuations across many sectors, we chose to increase our exposure to Value. Among the new positions, we increased our investments in Berkshire Hathaway, Alibaba, and Harley-Davidson, all of which we believe offer meaningful long-term upside. During July, these names performed well and validated the reallocation decision. We will continue to deploy the fund's capital into the most compelling opportunities, seeking to take advantage of prevailing market conditions.

Secondly, one of our venture late-stage investments underwent a significant revaluation during the month, adding +1.66% to the fund's return. We continue to see substantial long-term potential in this position.

Our European and Asian equity sleeves also finished the month in positive territory, jointly contributing +0.94% to monthly performance.

Finally, we were able to bring our cash level to 20.59%. This provides us with the flexibility to adapt to changing market conditions, particularly heightened volatility. We intend to maintain this cash level over the coming months. We have already achieved a solid year-to-date return, and our focus for the second half of 2026 is on consolidating those gains, especially as a potential interest rate hike appears closer than previously expected.

Our challenges

Our algorithmic models carry a certain concentration in semiconductor names, and as a consequence they were the worst-performing strategy during July's rotation, detracting -2.31% from the fund's monthly performance. While the drawdown may appear pronounced, it is worth noting that this strategy retains a considerable gain since inception. Consistent with our long-term horizon, we remain confident in the underlying names and will continue to hedge our highest-conviction stories.

Second, our U.S. equity sleeve was unable to close the month in positive territory, driven by certain names (including SpaceX), that experienced sharper pullbacks. As a result, this strategy dragged -1.71% to the fund's monthly return. However, we remain constructive, as the remainder of our U.S. positions posted modest gains during the month. Our focus going forward is on mitigating potential risks and optimizing allocation across the book.

Fund Risk Disclosures: Hedge funds are unregistered private investment pools that may invest and trade in various markets, strategies, and instruments (including securities, non-securities, and derivatives) and are not subject to the same regulatory requirements as mutual funds, including mutual fund requirements to provide certain periodic and standardized pricing and valuation information to investors. There are substantial risks in investing in hedge funds. You should carefully consider the following: Hedge funds represent speculative investments and involve a high degree of risk. An investor could lose all or a substantial part of their investment. Investors must have the financial ability, sophistication/experience, and willingness to bear the risks of an investment in a hedge fund. An investment in a hedge fund should be discretionary capital reserved strictly for speculative purposes. An investment in a hedge fund is not suitable or advisable for all investors. Only eligible qualified investors may invest in hedge funds. Hedge fund offering documents are not reviewed or approved by federal or state regulators. Hedge funds may be leveraged (including a high degree of leverage), and hedge fund performance can be volatile. An investment in a hedge fund may not be liquid, and there may be significant restrictions on the transfer of interests in a hedge fund. There is no secondary market for a hedge fund investment, nor is one expected to develop. A hedge fund may use a single advisor or employ a single strategy, which could result in a lack of diversification and higher risk. A hedge fund may involve complex tax structures, which should be read carefully, and may involve structures or strategies that may cause delays in important tax information being sent to investors. Hedge fund fees and expenses, which may be substantial, will offset the hedge fund's trading profits, regardless of any positive returns. Hedge funds are not required to provide periodic pricing or valuation information to investors. Hedge funds and their managers/advisors may be subject to various conflicts of interest. The foregoing summary is not a complete list of the risks and other important disclosures involved in investing in hedge funds and is subject to more complete disclosures contained in a hedge fund's confidential offering documents, which must be reviewed carefully. Directors and employees of Cretum Capital may make personal investments in certain hedge fund products for which Cretum Capital is compensated for introducing potential investors. Any personal investment by a director or employee of Cretum Capital in any hedge fund does not constitute a recommendation or endorsement of any specific product.
